Not illustrated. 1919 Excerpt: ...'til very late Before deciding that Your head is getting fat, And you can smell a rat. She says: "We'll meet tomorrow night, Unless we're blind or lose our sight." And feeling fine you b'lieve this tale, This story old, senile and stale--And take yourself away Until another day Shows error of your way. They never come back, these British daisies, For valueless agreements; They have the Hun beaten all to blazes; They never keep engagements. These modest maids, so papers state. Might grace the throne of potentate. These flawless kids, old England's pride. Might better seek a place to hide, And help old England's pride retain, Because a gent can't long remain--Before deciding that. As England's diplomat, She wins no derby hat. J. Bryan Dickenson, Y.1. The Battle of Eastleigh THE EARLY engagements of the battle were not fought on English soil, but on that of the "Land of Lafayette". It is fitting that this narrative, simply and hastily prepared, owing to the short time available for the work, should begin at the time and place of the first practical evidence of the existence of the Northern Bombing Group. Eastleigh is a phase of an undertaking, rather than a separate project unto itself. Like all other great enterprises, first a dream was dreamt, then, in a little old room at 1719 "H" Street, S. E., Washington, D. C, the work was planned from which, Phoenix-like, arose the Northern Bombing Group. The Northern Bombing Group was organized to coordinate with the British Bombing Units of the Royal Air Force, which were supporting the efforts of the Belgians to reclaim the Flemish coast. The selection of the personnel and equipment for this organization was effected under the personal direction of Lieut.-Com. Benjamin Briscoe, assisted ...
