“It is a book that shakes the heart... We know no man who has seen into the heart and verity of things more clearly, ‘Awake thou that sleepest...’ In the hands of a master in Israel the same thrilling, disturbing cry will wake men from their apathy and complacency.” -The British Weekly

“One of our prophetic voices is Norman Maclean... Some people do not know how dead they are, and others do not know how much life there is in the apparently dead. Let both sorts read this book and awake.” -Public Opinion

“Unless you have the heart of a Kaiser it must thrill you through and through.” -From ‘Defeat or Victory?’ by Arthur Mee and J. Stuart Holden

“There are a few writers in whom sympathetic insight and uncompromising moral judgment, mystic intuition and prophetic fire are so perfectly blended.” -The Christian

The eyes are illumined with radiance when they behold no longer processes and laws—but God. Who can compute that enrichment when suddenly the veil is rent and from some hill-top the eyes behold no longer meadow and moorland and the gleam of waters afar, but the Life behind them all—God; and everything created, the green sward and the clouds swimming in glory, the mist-caressed mountains and the great sea heaving in all its waves, become but one vast transparency through which God flashes His splendour on the enraptured soul. And in this return to God the soul is ever led on from glory to glory. That is the alluring power of Christianity. The Shepherd of souls leads us ever on until we come to the Cross and realise that the God of heaven and earth is the God of sacrifice; that His love stoops to agony that He may save. And onward from the Cross He leads until on our enraptured hearts there rises the vision of the Cross abiding still in the heart of God, and our eyes behold over all the universe the sheen of that love which still stoops to death that it may save. As we tread the way back, and go on ever nearer to the hidden fire, we feel the flame of His love filling all our being. And beauties undreamed of leap into light at each bend of the road. To come to God is to journey from death to life. The world has nothing great comparable to this.
