THE SECRET OF THE PINES: AN OLD FASHIONED STORY (3) ROXANNE HUNTER

When Silas Blackburn is found dead in a locked bedroom, his estranged granddaughter is suspected of murder by the private detective hired by Blackburn on the day of his death. After all, the old man had a healthy heart and he intended to disinherit Lauren the next morning. Complicating matters, the authorities believe Blackburn died a natural death, and when extraordinary events reveal foul play, no one can figure out how the crime was committed.

Lauren Blackburn can't remember what happened that night. She started the night partying in Boston and ended up seventy-five miles away in a deserted cottage near The Pines. Her sister Kate, who was living with and caring for their grandfather, found his body in the early morning after being awakened by strange noises in the old house. Everything seems to point to Lauren, except for when it doesn't. Lauren is grateful that Kate and her friend, Hart Spencer, are doing everything possible to help her, especially since their relationships have recently been strained by a terrible argument, but is Kate hiding something? Lauren hates to think it, but Kate and Hart seem a little too eager to sabotage the search for the truth. At least that's how it appears. Then Carlos Paredes, a friend from Lauren's dissipated city life and the last person to see her in Boston, shows up at the dilapidated estate uninvited and unwelcome, claiming he is only there to help Lauren. But is that why he is really at the Pines? Or is he part of a plot to frame Lauren for a murder she may or may not have committed? And if she didn't kill her grandfather, who did? How did the murderer get into the locked bedroom? When a second death occurs and key evidence goes missing, it's clear that otherworldly forces are at work in the old house, because there is no other explanation for what is happening.
